As soon as classes are over on Mondays, Thursdays and Fridays, I leave for work. And 15 I can get to work more quickly from my home than from campus.

Throughout all of human history, it is estimated that 30,000~50,000 languages have been spoken. Today, however, there are approximately 6,500 living languages, and this number is bound to decrease further due to a more and more inter-connected world. So why learn a second language? Well, think of a language as a key to opening many doors of opportunity. Unlocking these doors can lead to a world of possibilities and experiences. English is a good choice of second language. As the world's most widely-spoken language, even basic English skills can enhance your life in unexpected ways.

However, English is not the largest native-spoken language. The top 10 native languages are, in order: Mandarin Chinese, Spanish, English, Hindi, Bengali, Portuguese, Russian, Japanese, Punjabi, and Marathi. By speaking these languages, you could converse directly to about half of the world's peoples. That's a lot of open doors!

There are many reasons to learn English. As the most-widely spoken language, you are likely to be able to communicate with people anywhere in the world. In fact, English is the official language in nearly 60 countries. Surprisingly, even though the United States is the largest English-speaking country in the world, English is not its official language. In fact, the US does not have an official language.

English is the primary language used for international business, politics, science, technology, and education as well as travel, internet web pages, and social networking. Speaking English enhances job prospects. English also gives you access to an abundance of entertainment including music, films, and books. Opening these doors gives you wider cultural understanding and appreciation.
