V 次の英文を読み、後の問いに答えなさい。

I recently learned that Fujiya, a famous sweets maker, now offers cakes through *vending machines, making them ( 36 ) both day and night. Japan is famous for having a lot of vending machines. There are over 5 million of them. That's a lot! But why does Japan have so many? Let's look at the reasons.

First, Japan's big cities like Tokyo and Osaka have many people living very close together. With limited space and a high demand for quick and easy services, vending machines provide a perfect solution. Vending machines help by giving people what they need fast and without taking up much space. They work all day and night, so you can get a drink or a snack anytime.

Japanese people are particularly comfortable using automated machines for convenience. They are okay with buying items from a machine instead of from a person. It's normal there to get all sorts of things from vending machines. You can find not just drinks and snacks, but also hot meals, fruit, umbrellas, and other things.

Another reason is that Japan is a very ( 39 ) country. This means people don't worry about vending machines being broken into or stolen. So, they can put vending machines everywhere, even in places where there aren't many people around.

Finally, vending machines in Japan are really cool because they sell so many different things. They make life easier because you can buy something quickly without waiting in line or talking to anyone. The machines are a handy solution, blending with the Japanese lifestyle which highly values efficiency and convenience.

All these reasons show why vending machines are so popular in Japan. They fit perfectly with how people live there and what they need. It's a great example of how Japan uses technology to make everyday life better.
